TEACHING INTERNSHIP

FINAL REPORT

Class XII – English

Student Intern	Awais Ahmed
Academic Area	Applied Linguistics / English Language Teaching
Teaching Level	Class XII (12th Grade English)
Integrated Course	EACR – English for Academic & Career Readiness
Internship Dates	14 September – 16 October 2026
Length of Internship	5 Weeks = 15 Teaching Days
Hours Taught	55 Hours
Assessment	15 Hours

1. Introduction

Teaching is a practical profession which requires many skills from a teacher, including subject knowledge, good communication, careful planning, classroom management and an understanding of how students learn. An internship allows student teachers to connect the knowledge gained through their studies with practical teaching experience. This final report outlines my teaching, assessment, learning and reflections from my five-week internship teaching English to Class XII students.

During the internship, I focused on the Class XII English syllabus. This included prose, “Heroes”, the novel Goodbye, Mr. Chips, grammar and composition. The programme also included practical communication activities such as paragraph writing, formal job applications, CV writing, email writing and mock interviews to prepare students for their board examinations.

My portfolio includes 15 teaching days and 55 hours of direct teaching. The weekly timetable consisted of 1 hour on Mondays, 5.5 hours on Wednesdays and 4.5 hours on Fridays. A total of 15 hours was allocated to assessment. This report outlines the aims of my internship, the content taught, the teaching methods used, the assessments completed, the skills I developed, the challenges I faced and recommendations for future teaching.

2. Aims of the Internship

The main aim of the internship was to gain practical experience of teaching English at the higher secondary level. One important objective was to learn how to plan lessons according to students’ academic needs and the requirements of the syllabus. When teaching Class XII, it was important to help students understand both the textbook content and the language needed to answer examination questions.

Another aim was to improve students’ reading, vocabulary, grammar, writing and speaking skills. Students were given opportunities to read prose, discuss ideas, practise grammar, write paragraphs and essays, and take part in speaking activities. The internship also aimed to connect English learning with real-life situations involving academic and professional communication.

A further aim was to apply my knowledge of Applied Linguistics and English Language Teaching in a practical setting. I incorporated concepts such as Systemic Functional Linguistics, Genre-Based Pedagogy, Communicative Language Teaching and Speech Act Theory, as well as form–meaning–use approaches to grammar. Assessment and reflection were also important aims. Quizzes, writing activities, examinations and classroom observation helped me identify students’ learning needs.

3. Teaching Context, Timetable and Responsibilities

The internship was conducted at Class XII level in English over five weeks, from 14 September to 16 October 2026. I taught three days a week: Monday from 8:00 a.m. to 9:00 a.m., Wednesday from 8:00 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. and Friday from 8:00 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. This amounted to 11 hours of direct teaching per week and 55 hours over five weeks.

My responsibilities included introducing lessons, explaining textbook content, teaching grammar, supporting writing activities, encouraging pair work, conducting assessments and providing feedback. My daily log also records the skills I developed while teaching. These included identifying common language errors, helping students understand academic vocabulary, guiding paragraph writing, encouraging participation in speaking activities and giving useful feedback.

As there were different types of lessons to teach, I had to be flexible in my approach. Prose lessons required reading and comprehension activities. Grammar lessons needed clear explanations and structured practice. Writing lessons required examples and guided writing, while speaking lessons needed opportunities for students to communicate. This experience helped me choose activities according to the aims of each lesson.

4. What Was Taught and Weekly Breakdown

During the first week, I introduced the course and assessed students' language skills and knowledge of the syllabus. This gave me a basic understanding of their writing and grammar abilities. I focused on the prose lesson "The Dying Sun", including vocabulary and comprehension. I also taught subject–verb agreement and conducted a timed error-correction activity. These activities helped me identify students' strengths and areas that needed further practice.

During the second week, I focused on present and past tenses, paragraph writing and the prose lesson "Using the Scientific Method". I also taught "Heroes: First Year at Harrow". I used a structured approach to paragraph writing, guiding students to develop topic sentences and organise their ideas. Pair work during the scientific method lesson encouraged students to participate in speaking activities. The week included grammar, literature, writing and speaking practice.

During the third week, students practised active and passive voice and studied Chapters 1–3 of Goodbye, Mr. Chips. We also completed essay-writing activities and a mid-term progress examination. I introduced formal job applications and CV writing, helping students understand the structure and purpose of professional documents.

During the fourth week, we focused on prepositions and idioms from past papers, "Hitch-Hiking Across the Sahara" and Chapters 4–6 of Goodbye, Mr. Chips. We completed a literacy test, email-writing activities and mock interviews. These activities helped students consider how language changes according to the audience, purpose and situation.

During the fifth week, we focused on direct and indirect speech and Chapters 7–9 of Goodbye, Mr. Chips. Students completed a final board-practice examination, prepared a careers portfolio display and carried out self-assessment. These activities allowed me to assess their learning and reflect on their progress.

5. Teaching Approaches and Applied Linguistics

I incorporated several concepts from Applied Linguistics and English Language Teaching into my lessons. I used ideas from Systemic Functional Linguistics (SFL), particularly the concept of register. Students were encouraged to recognise differences between informal and formal language in academic prose. This was especially useful when teaching scientific vocabulary and textbook extracts.

Genre-Based Pedagogy supported students' paragraph writing and professional writing. I explained how texts are organised and how different parts contribute to their purpose. When teaching paragraph writing, I modelled topic sentences and cohesive paragraphs. During job-application and CV lessons, I discussed the structure of professional documents. I also drew on Swales' Genre Analysis to help students identify the typical stages or moves found in formal applications.

Communicative Language Teaching (CLT) was used throughout the internship. Pair work and speaking activities gave students opportunities to communicate their ideas in English. My reflective journal showed that pair work encouraged some students to participate more actively. Assigning different roles also helped create more balanced participation.

Speech Act Theory and politeness strategies were incorporated into email writing and mock interviews. Students practised choosing appropriate language to make requests, respond to others and show respect in professional situations. Form–meaning–use approaches to grammar helped students connect grammatical structures with their meanings and contexts. Critical Discourse Analysis and narrative analysis were also used when discussing descriptive language and literary texts. These approaches helped make language learning more meaningful.

6. Assessment

Assessment was an important part of the five-week programme. The portfolio included 15 hours of assessment, averaging three hours per week. In Week 1, assessments included a baseline assessment, a prose-reading quiz and an error-correction test. In Week 2, students completed a tense baseline assessment, paragraph-writing tasks and a speaking assessment.

In Week 3, students completed a quiz on transforming voice, a mid-term progress examination and a CV draft check. Week 4 included a preposition and vocabulary check, a literacy test and a mock interview. In Week 5, students completed a reported-speech test, a final cumulative board-practice examination and a portfolio self-assessment. Together, these activities assessed grammar, reading, writing, literature and speaking.

Different types of assessment served different purposes. Baseline assessments helped identify areas where students needed support. Formative assessments provided information during the teaching process and helped me decide what needed further practice. The mid-term and final examinations assessed learning across a wider range of content. According to my reflective journal, students showed improvement in writing organisation, grammatical accuracy and literary analysis between the initial baseline assessment and the final practice papers. However, the portfolio did not include numerical data or statistics to measure this progress.

7. Skills and Learning

The internship helped me develop a range of practical teaching skills. I gained experience explaining prose, grammar and writing activities to Class XII students and choosing suitable classroom tasks. Reading lessons required vocabulary support and comprehension questions. Writing lessons needed examples, planning and feedback, while speaking activities required a supportive learning environment.

I also improved my understanding of assessment. When preparing quizzes and tests, I had to consider the learning objective of each lesson. While checking students' work, I identified common difficulties, including incorrect tense use, sentence-structure problems, weak paragraph organisation and limited use of transition words. My reflective skills also improved because I considered what had gone well each day and what I could change in the next lesson.

The career-readiness activities showed me that English is useful for academic and professional communication. Teaching job applications, CVs, emails and mock interviews helped me understand that English learning extends beyond examinations. Students need to understand language forms and know how to use them appropriately in different situations.

8. Challenges and Reflection

My reflective journal highlights several challenges that students faced. Many found it difficult to apply grammar rules correctly in their writing. Some relied heavily on memorising textbook lessons. When asked to infer the meanings of scientific words from context, they were sometimes unsure. This showed me that students needed more guided practice.

Writing was another area of difficulty. The mid-term examination showed that students could remember details from Goodbye, Mr. Chips, but their longer essays needed better organisation and more effective use of transition words. Some students also found it difficult to express literary criticism in English. Sentence starters and model examples helped provide support. During speaking activities, pair work encouraged participation, although some confident students tended to dominate conversations.

My journal also helped me identify areas for improvement in my own teaching. On the first day, I spoke too quickly. In future lessons, I will speak more slowly and write key instructions on the board. During longer lessons, I realised that I needed to move around the classroom to monitor students in different rows. I also need to improve my management of Teacher Talk Time by keeping explanations shorter and giving students more opportunities to practise, especially during grammar lessons.

I learnt that group activities can take longer than expected. The mock interviews also required more time than I had planned. In future, I could use clearer time limits, visual prompts and peer-assessment checklists. I also learnt the importance of assigning roles during pair work so that every student has an opportunity to contribute. Overall, effective teaching requires continuous reflection and adjustment.

9. Recommendations for Future Teaching

In future teaching, I will continue to balance explanations with practical activities. Grammar rules become more useful when students apply them to sentences and textbook examples. Short, regular activities can help students recognise and correct common errors. In writing lessons, I will focus on topic sentences, cohesive paragraphs and transition words. Model paragraphs and guided writing can help students progress from supported tasks to independent writing.

Where possible, I will teach vocabulary in context and encourage students to guess meanings from surrounding words. For speaking activities, I will provide clear roles and time limits for pair and group work. Sentence starters can support students who find it difficult to express opinions or analyse literary texts.

I will continue to use regular and varied assessments. Short formative assessments can identify misunderstandings, while larger assessments can measure learning across a wider range of topics. Clear feedback will help students understand their mistakes and correct them. I could also introduce portfolio self-assessment earlier in the programme. These recommendations are based on students' learning needs and my own teaching reflections.

10. Conclusion

Overall, the five-week teaching internship was a valuable opportunity to apply my knowledge of Applied Linguistics and English Language Teaching. I gained experience teaching prose, literature, grammar, composition and practical communication. I completed 55 hours of direct teaching across 15 teaching days, along with 15 hours of assessment.

I learnt that effective English teaching requires careful planning, clear explanations, student participation, assessment and reflection. Students benefit when language is taught in meaningful contexts and when they have opportunities to use English for academic and professional purposes. The daily reflective journal helped me identify students' learning needs as well as areas where I could improve.

The internship strengthened my understanding of classroom responsibilities and the importance of adapting teaching methods to students' needs. It provided practical experience in teaching, assessment, communication and reflection, and gave me a useful foundation for my future development as a teacher.
